LADDERING A TALL CHIMNEY

FIFTY years ago Messrs. P. Dixon and Sons, of Shaddon Works, Carlisle, built a tall octagonal chimney shaft, which is a landmark for miles around, in connection with their cotton mill. This shaft is described in Bancroft's Treatise on "Tall Chimney Construction" as being of the following dimensions:—

	ft.	in.
Height from foundation to top	320	6
Do. Ground line to top	300	0
Outside measurement at ground line	17	4
Inside measurement at ground line	9	6
Outside measurement at top	9	0
Inside measurement at top.....	6	8

Built to a batter of 1 in 72.

Being the jubilee year of this tall shaft, Mr. Robert Todd woollen manufacturer the present occupier has had it repaired, and a new patent copper rope lightning conductor, fixed up the outside by Mr. Joseph Ball, large chimney and spire restorer and lightning conductor fixer, of York Castle, Oldham, Lancashire.

In carrying out this important undertaking the ascent to the top of the shaft was made by fifteen ordinary wooden ladders as used by painters, weighing from 20lbs. to 50lbs. each, according to their length, and of the average width of 11½in. at bottom and tapering to about 10 inches at the top, with distance pieces or skids about 8in. long projecting from one side to keep the ladders from the brickwork, thus providing a sure foot and hand hold for the workmen. The first length or section of ladder was placed at the base of the chimney shaft, and a hooked wrought-iron dog or holdfast, made from ½in. round iron about 9in. long, driven firmly into the brickwork four feet up from the bottom of the ladder, and a second holdfast four feet down from its top. The dogs or holdfasts are formed that they can be driven into the joints of brickwork and the ladders lashed to them.

Having fixed the first length, a free ladder is placed against it which the workman climbs until he can reach about four feet above the fixed length, and drives into the brickwork a dog, and attaches a pulley and block to the same, and one end of the rope reeved into the pulley-block is brought half-way down a second loose section of the ladder placed by the side of the first. The rope is there fastened, and the second length is hauled up by workmen at the base of the shaft until it is half its height above section No. 1. It is then temporarily lashed to the first length, and the steeple-jack climbs up it and drives another iron holdfast four feet above its top. He then shifts the pulley-block to the upper holdfast and descends. Length No. 2, still attached to the rope at its middle, is then hoisted up to its full height above the first length fixed. The climber then ascends up the rungs of length No. 2, which is still held by the pulley-block and rope, and drives in a holdfast near the bottom, and another near to the top, thus firmly holding its rungs to the brickwork of chimney, and so the second length forms a continuation of the first one fixed. The workman is then able to mount to the top of the second length and drive in another holdfast about one foot higher, and again with pulley-block and rope haul up section No. 3, and so on until the cap is reached, and here a difficulty presented itself. In Messrs. Dixon's shaft, at about ten feet from the top, a stone cornice projects 3ft., and the ladder inclining outwards had to be lashed to the one fixed close under the cap. When climbing this the workman's back was towards the ground. The top of slanting ladder was also lashed to the bottom of the ladder fixed above the stone cap. The operation of of laddering the chimney occupied five hours from the commencement.
